

PointOne Executive to Co-Anchor Strategic Discussion on Complex IP Services

AUSTIN, 12 May, 2007 – David Flanary, executive vice president with PointOne, will co-anchor a distinguished panel of industry experts at Capacity USA 2007 in New York City in a discussion entitled “Assessing The Extent To Which Carriers and Service Providers Have Moved Up The Value Chain to Offer Complex Wholesale Services Over An IP-Centric Network.”

With the United States Telecommunications Act of 1996 approaching a 12-year anniversary in February, supporters and opponents can agree on one thing: the dramatic change in applications and technology have caused a restructuring of the entire communications market place. There has been a dramatic evolution in business models to serve this marketplace and IP is at the forefront of the change. Mr. Flanary will present data on changes that have occurred within the service provider industry and how moving to IP has enhanced the availability of complex wholesale services, and how new revenue streams are created with international service provider relationships.

Panelists will explore the status of IP in the US carrier / service provider markets, adoption rates of IP, comparisons of US and European markets, as well as assessing the demand for highly sophisticated IP services and applications. Issues to be covered include the necessity and implications of the new paradigm of converged services, applications and networks for the growth of the IP service provider model.

PointOne's Flanary is a principal and a founder of the company and has been responsible for the dramatic growth of the company, which operates on the cutting edge of developing and delivering IP-based services and applications, and has over 14 years of communications sales, development and management experience.
